“Drawn-In” Rugs

I sometimes wonder if people really appreciate the simple charm of “drawn-in” (hooked) rugs. Oh, I know connoisseurs do, and that, now and again, unbelievably high prices are paid for historical or landscape patterns. But I mean everybody, everybody who loves old furniture, and its unpretending homeliness which was the background of our ancestors’ lives. In no sense do they become lofty chambers of magnificence; rooms where Sheraton settees in the golden tones Time has polished to a subdued radiance, or subtly carved ribbon-backed Chippendale chairs agree in eighteenth century perfection with inlaid Hepplewhite card-tables, for these demand the finest Oriental weaves. But with the plainer Colonial oak (if we are fortunate enough to have it) or peasant furniture from England and France; with Windsor or stenciled chairs and the drop-leaved tables and the flat-topped, unpretentious highboys that all our forefathers once possessed, they are admirable. Indeed, I don’t know any other thing that quite takes their place; they have a finer color-value than either braided or woven rugs, and infinitely more personality and presence.

It is just this vivid personal quality I want to stress, for, in some way, it makes them akin to the direct craftsmanship of the furniture. That’s why I hate what the old countrywomen hereabouts call “boughten patterns.” These completely lack the naïve spontaneity which women, working by the fireside on snowbound afternoons, or in the long hours of winter evenings, were able to create upon their canvasses, strips of stretched burlap, with their colors, home-dyed pieces of wool and skeins of yarn. They reflected the life around them: the cat sleeping on the hearth, their memories of gold and crimson autumn, the blues of the faïence upon the tall mantel.

Nowhere else, except in the pages of the mediaeval miniaturists who worked with precisely the same feeling, do flowers bloom in the same profusion of unpremeditated art. I have just been examining an illustration of “Le Roman de la Rose”, and, if I showed it to you, covering the figures with my hand, and you saw just the blossoms, you’d swear that you were looking at a North-Country hooked-rug. I fancy they must have some quality of eternal-ness. As most of us know them, even at their best, they are an early nineteenth century craft. Two rare examples, variants of the eighteenth century, I have seen, and that is all. But they are akin to old honey-dark oak, and the simpler eighteenth century furniture, for they are the lineal descendants of the “Turkey-work” done to beguile the tedium of winter by English country ladies in remote castles and manor-houses. In method and result, especially in the finely drawn and sheared types, the work is almost exactly the same.

Hooked rugs are not a revival, but a gentle continuation of the past. I only wish I had more! Still, where could I put them? But I can tell you this decorating truth; that no collection of old furniture is really quite complete without them.

ALICE VAN LEER CARRICK.
